-------------	------------	------------	---------------------	---------

People say you are what you eat. But do we really know what we're eating? Technology is changing our food with some very processed 36 results, even if cows and fruit aren't this big yet! At the moment, cows still look like this. But, now more than ever, factories are creating adly 37 food. That is, they change it to make it last longer or taste better. By the time the food gets to the supermarket, it often has salt, sugar, preservatives, colouring and flavouring all added to make us want to eat more of it. So what can we do? Planning meals A 38 is a good way to choose healthier food. What ingredients go into the meals you want to make? Do they have a good B 39 of the different food groups?

When you're shopping, it's important to E 40 for nutritional (营养的) information. In the UK and the USA, most food products have to have a nutritional information label. Read labels carefully. You may be surprised. You'll soon learn to recognize what's good for you. Not too much sugar, 131 41, or salt. Pizza and burgers are fine once in a while, but our bodies need a lot of fruit and vegetables every day to stay healthy. Eating fruit is not only good for you, but its A 42 sugars also make it tasty. Our bodies also need other nutritional elements found in food, like milk. Milk and cheese contain fats and proteins. If the cow eats healthy, fresh grass, the milk it produces will taste 43 better. And better tasting milk makes better tasting cheese. So, technology and nature can change the way our food tastes.

And there are many ways we can learn how to eat better and stay healthy. Remember: you are what you eat!

The surprising secret of polar bear fur

Although polar bears live in the Arctic, where temperatures hit -40°F , they stay warm thanks to their blubber (fat) and thick fur. The fat and thick fur keep _____ 65 _____ in and cold out. But scientists have found that polar bear fur provides more than insulation (隔热). It also contains oil that prevents ice from building up at all. _____ 66 _____ the researchers thought the structure of polar bear fur was what kept ice from sticking to it, but when they examined the fur under a microscope (显微镜), they realized that wasn't the _____ 67 _____. They noticed something else, however: The fur was very oily. The team didn't believe that could be what prevented the fur from freezing. To _____ 68 _____ whether their conclusion was right or wrong, they froze blocks of ice onto washed and unwashed polar bear fur, human hair, and ski equipment, which is coated with chemicals that reduce friction. Then they determined how much force was needed to remove the ice from each of these materials. Ice was _____ 69 _____ removed from the unwashed, greasy polar bear fur and the ski equipment. However, it was very hard to remove from the human hair and about four times harder to remove from the washed fur. After knowing for sure why the ice wasn't sticking, the team carefully examined the oil itself. They found that it was full of chemicals that repel (排斥) ice. The study's authors hope the findings will 70 the creation of materials that don't get icy. At present, some of the chemicals used to keep skis ice-free are harmful to the environment.

D. Answer the questions (根据短文内容回答下列问题) (12 分)

In Paris, there was a highly regarded (备受推崇的) modern magazine. One day, this magazine published an interesting question. The question was as follows, "If one day the world-famous Louvre Museum were suddenly caught in a fire, and under the extremely bad situation, only one piece of art could be rescued, which one would you choose?"

After the news spread, tens of thousands of letters from citizens poured into the magazine office. Among the many replies, two stood out. One was from an experienced old professor who was very famous in the art world. For him, every piece of the collection in the Louvre Museum was a perfect mix of history, culture and art. The other was a young man. He was full of life and talent with his unique thoughts and love for art.

The old professor wrote several pages explaining the reasons for his choice of a particular piece. However, when the editors saw the young man's answer, they were surprised and touched by this simple yet intelligent answer. The young man's answer was: choose the one closest to the door. This answer was like lightning cutting through the question, making people applaud (称赞).

Every piece of the collection in the Louvre is a unique treasure in the world. In such a moment, instead of wasting time thinking about difficult choices, it was better to take the chance and rescue just one piece if possible.

When a disaster happens, there isn't enough time to weigh the advantages and disadvantages of each choice, even if each choice is extremely important. This idea of taking a chance and taking quick action applies to life and work.

78. What kind of magazine was mentioned in the story?
79. Who did the two outstanding replies come from?
80. What was the main difference between the two replies?
81. Why did the editors find the young man's answer surprising and touching?
82. The story tells us to take quick action in face of difficulties, doesn't it?
83. Which of the two replies do you prefer? Give your reasons.
